Exciting programs in long term care--designed to better serve elderly persons with chronic diseases--are highlighted in this rich volume. The crucial economic and physical factors of long term care that specifically affect and influence the work of physical and occupational therapists are thoroughly addressed. Experts discuss insurance options and pitfalls that are a part of paying the enormous and costly bills for the process of rehabilitation. Several nontraditional, specialized occupational therapy treatment programs aimed at particular patient populations--Hispanics, cancer patients, the very disabled elderly--are closely scrutinized. In detailing the importance of preparing therapists and other health professionals for the specialized work of long term care with older patients, contributors focus on adequate training and education for long term care providers and personal interactions among patients and staff.
